

More on Relationships
by Philip B. Crosby
February 22, 1982

The authoritarian is always wrong.

We do not need to learn yet once again that people cannot be made to do things because the things are right for them. And it would not be a better world were it possible to do so.

No one knows what goes on in another's heart, many do not even know their own. So to demand obedience or understanding from another is impractical, immature and inefficient.

People can only be led to a comprehension through patience, education and association with those who have benefited from personal improvement. Yelling at them won't change their ways.

In this relationship both are altered to become wiser and more productive. The waves of a proper communication spread out to cover things undreamed of when the pebble is first dropped.

Take time to develop a relationship the way you would cultivate a garden. It will nourish you in return.

dlk
P-CROSBY
0222RELATION